A Legacy of Provocation

The story of Agent Provocateur The Dorset Boy begins in the vibrant streets of London in the early 2000s. Founded by Joe Corré, son of renowned fashion designer Vivienne Westwood, the brand initially made a name for itself with its provocative and often controversial lingerie collections. However, it was with the launch of The Dorset Boy line in 2007 that Agent Provocateur truly began to make waves in the menswear world.

The Dorset Boy was conceived as a celebration of British working-class culture and style. Corré, who grew up in the eponymous Dorset town, drew inspiration from the aesthetics of traditional English tailoring, military uniforms, and punk rock subculture. The resulting collections were a unique blend of classic menswear staples and avant-garde design elements, pushing the boundaries of what was considered acceptable in menswear.

Signature Style

Agent Provocateur The Dorset Boy's signature style is instantly recognizable and defies easy categorization. At its core, the brand's aesthetic is characterized by a juxtaposition of traditional and unconventional elements. Classic silhouettes, such as tailored jackets, waistcoats, and trousers, are reimaged with unexpected details and unconventional fabrics. Military-inspired elements, such as cargo pockets and camouflage patterns, are combined with luxurious materials like silk and velvet.

The brand's color palette is equally distinctive, often featuring muted tones inspired by the British countryside, such as olive green, navy blue, and mustard yellow. However, The Dorset Boy is not afraid to experiment with bold and vibrant hues, creating a unique and eye-catching aesthetic.
