

Obama Education Takeover: Encounter Broadensides 27

The Obama administration's education policies have been the subject of much debate, with critics arguing that they represent a federal overreach into local control of education. One of the most controversial aspects of these policies has been the expansion of the federal government's role in teacher evaluation and accountability.

In 2010, the Obama administration released a new set of education standards, known as the Common Core State Standards (CCSS). The CCSS are a set of academic standards that outline what students should know and be able to do at each grade level in English language arts and mathematics. The standards were developed by a consortium of states, with the goal of creating a more consistent and rigorous set of standards across the country.

The CCSS have been met with mixed reactions. Some educators and parents have praised the standards for providing a clearer and more focused set of expectations for students. Others have criticized the standards for being too narrow and for focusing too much on testing.

In addition to the CCSS, the Obama administration has also implemented a number of other education policies, including:

- The Race to the Top program, which provides funding to states that adopt certain education reforms, such as implementing the CCSS and overhauling teacher evaluation systems.
- The Teacher Incentive Fund, which provides grants to states and school districts to develop and implement performance-based teacher evaluation systems.
- The Investing in Innovation (i3) program, which provides funding to schools and other organizations to develop and implement innovative education programs.

These policies have been controversial, with critics arguing that they represent a federal overreach into local control of education. They also argue that the policies are too focused on testing and accountability, and that they do not provide enough support for teachers.
