The causes of the war are complex. One of the main causes was the Dakota people's dissatisfaction with the United States government. The government had promised to provide the Dakota with land and annuities, but these promises were not always fulfilled. In addition, the Dakota people were experiencing a number of hardships, such as crop failures and disease. These hardships made it difficult for the Dakota to survive, and they began to resent the United States government.

The war began on August 17, 1862, when a group of Dakota warriors attacked settlers in Acton Township, Minnesota. The warriors killed several settlers and burned their homes. The attack sparked a wave of violence that quickly spread throughout Minnesota. Dakota warriors attacked settlers in dozens of communities, and they killed hundreds of people.

The United States government responded to the attacks by sending troops to Minnesota. The troops quickly defeated the Dakota warriors, and they forced the Dakota to surrender. The war ended in September 1862, with the Dakota people being forced to cede their land to the United States government.

The 1862 Dakota War was a tragedy for both the Dakota people and the United States. The war resulted in the deaths of hundreds of people, and it destroyed the Dakota people's way of life. The war also damaged the relationship between the United States and the Dakota people, and it left a legacy of mistrust that continues to this day.
